

Zonta's Day of Film 2018:

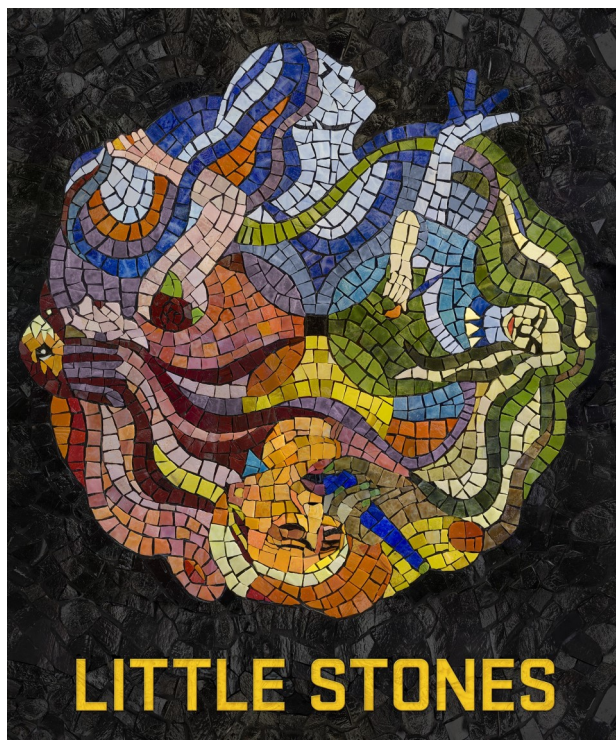

LITTLE STONES weaves together the personal narratives of four women using art to empower women and girls.

Graffiti artist Panmela Castro has risen to the top in Brazil by blazing her own trail and using street art to raise awareness about an issue that hits very close to home: domestic violence.

Sohini Chakraborty, a dancer and sociologist, volunteered at a shelter for sex trafficking survivors in India. She knew instinctively that dance could help girls reclaim their bodies after the trauma of trafficking.

Senegalese hip-hop star and activist Sister Fa regularly tours in West Africa, using her fame to spark a dialogue around the taboo subject of female genital mutilation.

American fashion designer Anna Taylor was a college student when she met Judith, an unemployed Kenyan seamstress, in a Nairobi slum. Anna hired Judith to sew her clothing designs, and later founded Judith & James which trains and employs impoverished Kenyan women to produce high fashion clothing.
